Some idea of the severity of the storm durbe formed from the fact that at 8 A. M., according to the official record at the downtown Weather Bureau, between five and six inches of snow had fallen on a level. In some of the streets and in the parks, where the wind had full sweep, long, rolling drifts were heaped up, sometimes two feet or more in depth, and in other places the sidewalks and pavements were swept bare. EFFECTS ON THE SURFACE RAILBOADS.

The sudden and heavy snowfall made things particularly uncomfortable for the street-car companies. Most of them had started out their cars from the stables with single teams, and before the poor animals got back from their early trip many of them were completely done up.

Before daybreak extra teams had been sent out from all the stables in town to the assistance of the overworked horses, and after 7 o'clock no cars were started without doubles

The big sweepers which came rushing by at intervals made things easier for a little while, but the roadway was soon filled up again.

in the neighborhood of the Post-Office, where so many of the surface lines centre, there was a continual blockage of cars and trucks, which lasted until after in oclock, when there were signs of a let up in the storm.
